changes that occur as our bodies age are caused by free radicals. Damage to DNA, protein cross-linking and other changes have been attributed to free radicals. Over time, this damage accumulates and causes us to experience aging. There is some evidence to support this claim.

Learn About the Free Radical Theory of Aging

The free-radical theory of aging was first proposed by Dehman Harman in the 1950s. Harman's theory, which now has various modifications, holds more weight than the rate of living theory or the wear and tear theory. Possibly combined with the reproductive-cell cycle theory or the cellular senescence theory, a general understanding of why aging occurs can begin to emerge.

Free-Rider Incentive. The underlying incentive which generates the free-rider problem can be explained via the application of the Prisoner's dilemma, within the context of contributing to a public good. Suppose two people were to split a contribution to a public service (such as for a police station) with society benefiting from their contribution.
